Local Family has Connection with Club

The below photo of the Holland family was recently posted on Facebook. Former club member and local expert historian John Ashbury provided some additional information regarding the Hollands including pointing out that the Kiwanis Club of Frederick placed a plaque at the site of the Holland's former home. See facing page.

Here's an piece I found in "...and all our yesterdays..." on Page 107. It deals in depth with Clifford Holland. "Before the Civil Rights movement allowed Frederick's black population to use the facilities established for its white residents, Negroes provided for themselves with grocery stores, a movie theater, clothing stores, and even a public library of sorts. On March 27, 1913, Clifford Holland, a local remodeling contractor in the colored community, opened the Young Men's Colored Reading Club of Frederick at 113 Ice Street, in the home of the Reverend Ignatius Snowden, a local evangelist. Previously there had not been a local library facility which allowed Negroes entrance. The library worked a little differently from the way they operate today. The men would borrow a book and read it. Each week they would gather at 113 Ice Street and discuss with each other the material they had read during the past week. As was the practice through most of this century, Negro businesses were usually located in the first room off the street of a residential property. The family occupied the rest of the property as their home. The colored library was no exception. Holland lived at 116 West All Saints Street and for a time operated a small grocery store there in addition to his contracting business. He later ran a similar store on the northeast corner of West All Saints and South Court Street, where Lee's Mens Wear was located for many years in mid-century. He was a deacon at First Missionary Baptist Church and was Worshipful Master of Fredericktonian Lodge Number 12. He served the Knights of Pythias as a member for most of his adult life. His interest in reading never faded. In his later years he would sit at his dining room table and read three or four newspapers late into every evening and eat peanuts. He would retire in the wee hours of the morning and seldom arise before noon." There is also a plaque on the building at 113 Ice Street on the building that replaced Rev. Snowden's home. It was placed by the Kiwanis Club of Frederick. HOPE this is the same Clifford Holland.
